Overview

This report is a summary of the key findings and recommendations arising from EY-Parthenon's research into and analysis of the world's rapidly growing and increasingly important battery economy. As well as explaining why Asia has emerged as the dominant player in this sector, the summary report also considers how Western governments can help their countries become leaders in domestic battery manufacturing through targeted and timely economic interventions. The recommendations we have drawn from our research are particularly relevant to the UK, which is highly vulnerable to being left behind in the race to meet accelerating demand for EV batteries.
